7 Steps to Deal with Parent Concerns

1. Never talk to someone that's yelling at you

First and foremost, never talk to someone if they're yelling at you. You're giving up your time to help out their kids and deserve more respect than that. Thankfully, this doesn't happen too often anyway... But I've seen times where parents came down from the stands yelling at the coach and the coach has tried to defend his decisions on the spot. Which, as you can imagine, quickly escalates into a shouting match between the coach and parent.

Rather, if a parent comes up to you frustrated and yelling, in a clam voice let them know that you'd be happy to discuss whatever their concern is when they've calmed down.

2. Discuss their problem at a later time

If a parent gets frustrated with you during the game and walks over and demands you talk to them this instant (during the game), kindly let them know that you're happy to talk to them about it, but they will need to wait until after the game when you can both sit down and talk about it alone, without the other parents or the players watching.

If you don't have time to talk to them after the game, schedule a meeting with them at a later time.

Scheduling a meeting for the next day or later is my preferred option. This gives both yourself and the parent time to sit down and think about the conversation prior to meeting, rather than blurting out what ever comes to mind when they're angry.

But often the parent will insist on not leaving the venue until you have talked to them after the game.

3. Get someone else to sit in on the meeting

I always get my assistant coach to sit in on private meetings. This can be beneficial in many ways. Such as;

1. Clarifying facts that may arise during the meeting.
2. A witness incase anything happens.
3. To recall comments made in the meeting at a later time if needed.

4. Hear them out

Without interrupting!

The parent needs to feel like they're being heard. If you're constantly interrupting and disputing their comments mid-conversation, the only thing you're going to achieve is making the parent much angrier than they already are. Hear them out and get their complete side of the story before you start adding your two cents in.

The last thing you want to do is make the situation worse than it already is.

5. Body language

You must show the parent that you're paying attention to what they have to say by using good body language.

Don't sit back in your chair with your arms crossed. This shows a type of arrogance and stubbornness and will only infuriate the parent further. Sit forward and look them in the eyes. Nod when they're speaking to show that you understand.

6. Keep your composure. Even if they don't

Even if they come in blasting you for reasons you don't understand, it's important to make sure you keep calm and talk rationally. You don't want to get into a shouting match and say something you'll regret in the future.

If you find the way they're speaking to you is unacceptable, politely ask them not to talk to you that way, and if they continue to do so, you'll have to end the conversation. Then if they do continue to speak to you in an unacceptable way, simply tell that that you're not willing to talk to them when they're in this state and you'd be happy to talk to them again when they've cooled off.

7. The correct way to respond

Once you've let them have their say, it's your turn to respond. The correct way to respond is going to differ greatly every situation. But I'm going to give you a couple of tips I use that help in the response.

Even if you don't fully agree with their argument, let the parent know that you can see where they're coming from. Acknowledge the points in their argument that you agree with. Acknowledge their son/daughters strengths before you tell that parent what they need to improve on. For example you may have this conversation... "I understand where you're coming from. Look, Johnny's a very good shooter and we'd love to have him out on the floor more to make the most of that. The problem is that he isn't as strong as we need him to be defensively."
