Earning the Right to be a Leader

Ask any high school athletic director in America how they balance their time between management and leadership and you're likely to find most would admit they spend the majority of their time on management. Scheduling games, buses, and officials, along with managing a budget and dealing with conflict are a big part of the job. These tasks can be overwhelming and often leave little time for leadership. With limited time, resources and access to head coaches, how can we as athletic directors have the greatest influence possible within our school community? How do we earn the right to lead? I've spent the last two years in my position creating more efficient systems for scheduling, communication, and budget. By doing so, this has allowed me to spend more time creating a common language among my coaches, athletes, and parents around purpose-based athletics. The most important thing I've learned on this journey is leadership is a mindset, not a skill set. If you commit to our own professional development and invest time in building relationships you can have great influence over changing the win-at-all-costs sports culture in your community.

To Be a Better AD, You Have to Be a Better You

The first step in earning permission to lead is a commitment to your own professional development. Reading professionally and constant collaboration with others in the field has helped me define who I am as a servant leader and helped me develop my personal guiding principles. These principles (listed below) not only create trust between my office and all stakeholders, they also provide me with a lens to look through when creating a vision for my department.

1. Live your purpose
2. Do what you said you would do
3. All students deserve better
4. Plan your work, work your plan
5. Invest in relationships
6. Live Your Purpose
